

13.10 The glass transition temperature is, for a noncrystalline ceramic, that temperature at which there is a change of slope for the specific volume versus temperature curve (Figure 13.6).

The melting temperature is, for a crystalline material, that temperature at which there is a sudden and discontinuous decrease in the specific-volume-versus-temperature curve.