

13.16 Borosilicate glasses and fused silica are resistant to thermal shock because they have relatively low coefficients of thermal expansion; therefore, upon heating or cooling, the difference in the degree of expansion or contraction across a cross-section of a ware that is constructed from these materials will be relatively low.