

7.36 (a) The driving force for recrystallization is the difference in internal energy between the strained and unstrained material.

(b) The driving force for grain growth is the reduction in grain boundary energy as the total grain boundary area decreases.